The Two Grenadiers,

Schumann

To France were returning two grenadiers,
Their Russian captivity leaving,
And when they came to the German frontier
Their heads were bowed down with grieving,
'Twas there that they both heard the sorrowful tale,
Disaster their country had shaken,
Defeated and scattered a valiant host,
And the Emp'ror, the Emp'ror been taken.

Then sorrowed together the grenadiers,
Such doleful news to be learning,
And one spoke out amid his tears,
"My wounds once again are burning."
The other said: "The song is done,
Would that I too were dying,
But I've a wife and child at home,
On me for bread relying."

"Nor wife nor child give care to me,
What matter if they are forsaken;
Let them beg their bread if they hungry be,
My Emp'ror, my Emp'ror is taken.
O grant me, brother, but one prayer,
If my hours I now must number,
My body take home to my native land,
In France let me peacefully slumber.

"My cross of honor with its band,
Leave on my bosom lying,
My musket place within my hand,
My sword around me tying.
Thus will I listen within the tomb,
A sentry still and unstirring,
Till the war of cannon resounds through the gloom,
And tramp of the horsemen spurring.

"Then over my grave will my Emperor ride,
While swords with clash are descending,
While swords with clash are descending;
Then armed to the teeth will I ride from the grave,
My Emp'ror, my Emp'ror defending.

CLASS ODE

When our final farewells have been many times said
And these doors close behind us tonight,
Earnest life with its struggles is beck'ning ahead,
Where there's many a foul wrong to right.
In the thick of the fray, with the bold hearts that do,
There's a place in the ranks we must fill;
Duty calls but, dear classmates, a warm health to you,
Ere we answer that call with a will.

By the dim polar sea, or where tropic suns beat,
Feet that trip light tonight may long roam;
While others shall linger where old friends oft meet,
And close hold the keys of sweet home.
But we'll ever remember the debt that we owe
To the hands that so wisely have swayed;
And our ways shall be lit by the radiant glow
From these memories that never shall fade.

Water Lilies,	Karl Linders
---------------	---------------------

Water lilies floating on the stream,
Water lilies bend your head and dream,
Water lilies with your hearts of gold,
Water lilies white, your petals fold ;
Water lilies nodding to and fro,
Water lilies in the sunlight glow ;
Water lilies in the twilight's gleam,
Water lilies bow your heads and dream.

Fresh, fair, fragrant water lilies,
Beauteous water lilies,
Dainty water lilies,
Pure, rare, sparkling water lilies,
Radiant water lilies grow.

Swaying, swaying on the lake,
Where the laughing ripples surge and break,
Shedding their sweet perfume on the air,
Water lilies ever bright and fair,
Drops of water flashing on your stems,
Sparkling on your petals, fairy gems,
Nodding to the breezes and the showers,
Water lilies, queen of all the flow'rs.
